RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE
A FILM BY KATJA ESSON

LOGLINE
Miami is ground-zero for sea-level-rise. When residents of the historic Liberty Square public housing project learn about a $300 million revitalization plan for their neighborhood, which has long suffered from disinvestment, they know that this sudden interest comes from the fact that their neighborhood is located on the highest-and-driest ground in the city. Now they must prepare to fight a new form of racial injustice - Climate Gentrification.

SYNOPSIS
RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE is a character-driven verité documentary that weaves personal stories in and out of the larger social justice narrative of Climate Gentrification. Foremost it is about a community fighting to save itself from being erased in a rapidly changing Miami.

RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE is set in the oldest segregated public housing project in the South: Liberty Square, at the heart of Miami’s Liberty City. Underserved for decades and suffering from chronic disinvestment, Liberty City has one of the highest poverty rates in the nation. But as rising seas threaten Miami’s luxurious beachfront, wealthy property owners are pushing inland to higher ground. Liberty City, which sits on a ridge, is now real estate gold.

Our story begins in 2017, when the first homes of Liberty Square are being razed to the ground and replaced by a new mixed-income development. Initially, there was hope in the community that this development would be different from past urban renewal projects, but residents cannot forget Miami’s long history of broken promises. For the past 5 years, we have been filming with the people that are impacted by the developers’ bulldozers.

Sam Kenley is a single mother of seven who has lived in public housing all her life and now has to decide what is best for her family, to stay or to go. Samantha Quarterman is the founder and principal of Liberty Square’s only alternative school who was promised by the developer that he would build her a brand-new school building. Local environmental activist Valencia Gunder sees educating her community about Climate Gentrification as a powerful weapon to achieve climate justice. Aaron McKinney is working as ‘community liaison’ for the developer. Aaron is convinced mixed-income housing is the solution to generational poverty, but he knows the ambiguity of his position: “My own family thinks I sold my soul to the devil.”

The stories of RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE originate at the intersection of race, climate, and gentrification. Our film interrogates assumptions of who matters—and who doesn’t—and about land and who controls it.
RAISING LIBERTY SQUARE
A FILM BY KATJA ESSON

DIRECTOR’S STATEMENT
Liberty Square is located only a few blocks from where I live. When I arrived in Miami in the late 1980s to study film, this crazy, exciting, vain place blew my German mind. My first job in the film industry was as a production-assistant on 2Live Crew Hip Hop music videos, all filmed in Liberty City. Following my dream of making documentaries I moved to New York City—but Miami never left me.

When I moved back in 2016, Miami had exploded into a metropolis with a changed cityscape and thriving new neighborhoods. Only Liberty City seemed frozen in time, and then the bulldozers started rolling in.

I picked up my camera and started filming. I wanted to preserve something remarkable; something that continues to be ignored by the larger part of the city. This was 2017, and we have been filming ever since. Liberty City residents, elders and community organizers keep calling on me to film, saying, “You are our eyes!”

During our five years of filming together, the protagonists’ growing trust and collaboration has been fiercely pushing me to make this documentary. As they share their stories, an intimate portrait of a community that is fighting for their neighborhood is emerging. My hope is that RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE will become part of the larger conversation among communities like Liberty City around the globe.

DIRECTOR Q/A

Why did you make this film?
Liberty Square is located only a few blocks from where I live. When I arrived in Miami in the late 1980s to study film, this exciting place blew my German mind. My first job in the film industry was as a production-assistant on ‘2Live Crew’ Hip Hop music videos, all filmed in Liberty City. Following my dream of making documentaries I moved to New York City—but Miami never left me.

When I moved back in 2016, Miami had exploded into a metropolis with a changed cityscape and thriving new neighborhoods. Only Liberty City seemed frozen in time, and then the bulldozers started rolling in.

During our five years of filming together, the protagonists’ growing trust and collaboration has been fiercely pushing me to make this film. As they share their stories, an intimate portrait of a community that is fighting for their neighborhood is emerging.

Miami is experiencing the effects of sea level rise before the rest of the country, with a 400% increase in annual flooding in the past 10 years according to a report by the University of Miami’s School of Marine and Atmospheric Science. By exploring how sea level rise affects the lives of residents of the oldest public housing project in the South, ‘Razing Liberty Square’ will make “climate gentrification” an undeniable reality to audiences everywhere.

The film, focused on the microcosm of Liberty City, and Miami by extension, has international resonance. The question of where and how we live, who must stay or go and how climate change exacerbates the existing inequity in our nation’s cities, has never been more relevant.

Miami is ranked second (after New York City) in the US in income disparity. The city has the most dramatic housing crises in the country with the coastline relentlessly pushing inland. Our film brings into sharp focus how low-income communities of color are disproportionately affected by climate change because the need to move to higher ground has created a new manifestation of racial and economic injustice - climate gentrification.

Gentrification and the lack of affordable housing is universally felt in every city across the nation. The difference is, in Miami, for the first time, climate change becomes a driver in the process. Ironically, Miami’s Black population, which was deliberately removed far from the precious coastline, is suddenly sitting on Miami’s ‘real estate goldmine’. Filmed over five years, we have the unique opportunity to watch climate gentrification in real time.
To understand how this film will speak to audiences in cities beyond Miami, we look to the reality on the ground and on the horizon: coastal cities, like New Orleans and New York are both set to suffer massive flooding in the next 20-50 years, losing whole parts of their cities underwater, and both face intense affordable housing crisis today, with extreme economic disparities and rapid gentrification. Los Angeles will not only lose land and beaches to sea level rise but also suffers from drought, fires and intense heat. It has also been in a state of emergency for homelessness since 2015. Phoenix is not only the fastest growing city in the U.S. but is expected to imminently run out of drinking water, as a third of the year will have daily temperatures of over 100 degrees.

The stories of RAZING LIBERTY SQUARE originate at the intersection of race, climate, and gentrification. Our film interrogates assumptions of who matters—and who doesn't—and about land and who controls it.

Over the years, when it became clear that the documentary would expose many of the developer's questionable practices as well as various broken promises that we witnessed, we became extremely vigilant in keeping our material and any cut of the film under wraps. We did this to protect the protagonists, our partners, our team. But one year before we wrapped filming, the trailer of our film was leaked to the developer who is extremely powerful and controls many sectors - from political to cultural - of life in Miami.

The developer was furious and started to pressure our main protagonists to pull out of the documentary. If he had succeeded, we would not have a film, but the opposite happened. She became even more determined to tell her story.

Now that the 'cat was out of the bag', the developer knew that the film would unflinchingly expose the reality of how the original Liberty Square residents would be impacted by the new development. Five months later, Miami’s Director of Housing and Urban Planning made a call to the new Miami Film Commissioner demanding that he “stop this film.”

Did the film change from your original idea for the film from the beginning?

My initial inspiration was wanting to tell the history of the Liberty Square I had gotten to know when I was a Miami film student in the 1980s. But when people started to share their stories, I quickly learned that in addition to being a major hub of African American music and culture in the mid-twentieth- century, Liberty City also sits on the highest and driest ground in Miami. I was taught about Climate Gentrification, a term coined in Miami, and the sudden interest of government and developers in this decade-long underserved neighborhood took on a different meaning. To quote Valencia Gunder, the Climate Justice Activist in ‘Razing Liberty Square’ who knows Miami’s long history of disenfranchisement and divestment: “There was a hidden motive then and there is a hidden motive now…”
What were the challenges in making this film?
Although Miami has a bustling commercial media culture, it seems to mostly pay attention to projects that are quickly made, glitzy and celebrity driven. The work of digital storytellers, journalists, and long-form documentarians (especially those who work on social issue projects) is often undervalued. The developer in our story is so powerful in Miami that it was/is very difficult to even get any press coverage out about the real conditions of the NEW Liberty Square apartment complex. Many serious journalists have left or avoid working in Miami because most local news outlets wont publish articles that question the status quo. In that way it is extremely difficult to hold anyone accountable.

What were the successes that you had in making this film?
I consider one of my biggest accomplishments to be earning and maintaining the trust of the people portrayed in my films. My mission is to cinematically explore the exciting, complicated, and at times messy American culture. Each time I make a film, I am aware of both my own immigrant status and my own white privilege, which is differently present in each project. As an outsider to American culture, who has lived in the US for more than 30 years, I am ‘in it’ but not ‘off it’ which gives me a unique perspective. I am immersing myself in the space, building relationships and creating an atmosphere in which my protagonists feel free to reveal their own stories. The intimacy of my working methods is a safe space for addressing larger issues such as violence, poverty, and racism, making them personal and resonant.

Was there something special technically that you utilized in making this film?
The aerial photography becomes another 'voice' within our film. From high views of the Florida coast to close tracking shots of the razing and building process all gives the viewer unique insights into our story. Our cinematic widescreen language - often reserved for epic Westerns - portrays Liberty Square residents with a visceral connection to their physical surroundings. The widescreen also foregrounds ‘the land’ as a primary ‘character’ in the documentary. Land that was used as a tool of discrimination, land that is now disappearing because the sea is rising.

What do you want audiences to take away from this film?
I want our film to move people to engage in conversations about how families are impacted by both the climate crisis and housing insecurity. My hope is that these dialogues will help to change past narratives and misconceptions about Liberty Square and other public housing communities. From the start, the goal of the project has been to create a platform to share the voices of community members as authentic and unfiltered as possible. The people who we filmed with for over five years are their own 'experts' as they tell their own stories. With this approach, we hope that audiences will connect with and care about both the people and the place.
By sharing the stories of individuals and families who are living on the frontlines of the climate crisis, I want audiences to understand that the dangers of Climate Gentrification will eventually impact all communities.

I want audiences to look more critically at the current models of building mixed income developments in low-income neighborhoods not just in Miami, but in cities all over the country, and feel the necessity of true community involvement from start to finish.

Within our film, the people of Liberty Square bear witness to their own experiences of how the climate crisis has affected their housing options. My hope is that the conversations and gatherings inspired by our documentary will help to build bridges between different communities and foster sharing of information and resources that advance creative solutions.

KEY MILESTONES

2015
- The ambitious urban renewal project announced by Mayor Carlos Gimenez (today US congressman).
- A developer close to the Mayor gets the $300 job.
- There is a lot of hope because of the innovation and promise that all residents can stay during the process of construction.

2017
- Demolition of the buildings in Block 1 begins.
- Aaron Mc Kinney believes this will be solution for his community.
- Samantha Quarterman trusts the developer’s promises that they will build her a new school building.
- Sam Kenley and family can't wait to move into the new buildings.
- Meanwhile Valencia Gunder gives the real reason for the sudden investment and warns about the hidden motives.

2018
- The developer suddenly goes back on his promise and the residents get vouchers to move out of the community.
- Aaron is shocked about this development.
- Sam Kenley needs to decide if she stays or leaves her community.
- Samantha Quarterman is worried that the developer will go back on the promise for her school as well.
- Valencia Gunder manages to buy a house right next to Liberty Square, as an act of activism.

2019
- The grand opening of the new Block 1. The Mayor and other officials’ laude the project and claim that not a single person has been displaced, “we kept our promise”.
- Aaron, who knows that hundreds of families are leaving with the vouchers, realizes the hypocrisy and begins to doubt his role.
- Samantha Quarterman is disillusioned because she realizes the developer has no intention to build her a new school.
- Sam Kenley finally decides to stay and moves into one of the new units in Block 1.

2020
- After a small tropical storm, Sam Kenley has cracks and leaks in her new unit.
- Residents are afraid of the hostile management.
- Valencia Gunder has a housewarming of her new home.

2021
• Aaron finally comes to terms that he was used by the developer and never had a seat at the table. He quits.
• Samantha manages to get land from the city and will build her own school.

2022
• Aaron joins a black-owned development company who is known for community-centered work.

2023
• Only 3 of the 9 blocks are finished. Complains about cracks, leaks and mold continue.
