LOGLINE

After fifteen years of imprisonment, Ziad struggles to adjust to modern Palestinian life as the hero everyone hails him to be. Unable to distinguish reality from hallucination he unravels and forces himself to go back to where it all began.

SYNOPSIS

In 1992, Al-Amari Refugee Camp in Palestine is a collection of cement cubicles, angles, colors, smells and sounds. It's tight, but eight year olds Ziad and Ramzi find the space to explore. While playing around with old tools, Ziad accidentally cuts Ramzi. Ramzi stabs Ziad with a screwdriver. Immediately, they become best friends.

In 2002, teenagers Ziad and Ramzi are the stars of Al-Amari basketball team. But, when Ramzi is shot dead in a crossfire, Ziad and his team seek revenge. Ziad is captured by Israeli forces, tortured, and then released fifteen years later.

Paraded as a hero upon his release, Ziad feels like a fraud. Ziad attempts to get his life in order, and works with an old friend at a construction site. However, the fast paced world and demand of modern Palestinian life become overbearing. Ziad pushes all loved ones away and struggles in silence.

He finds it difficult with both love interests, Mina and Salma. Salma, a girl from the camp madly in love with Ziad, offers him stability. A family friend, she pushes his limits by her constant presence in his space. On the other hand, Mina, a Palestinian-American filmmaker, represents all that is different. She holds the key to his self exploration. Her interviews chip away at his psyche as they move from past memories, to future dreams.

Haunted by the memories of his past, Ziad fails to move forward. Living in limbo, unable to distinguish reality from hallucination he unravels and forces himself to go back to where it all began.

DIRECTORS' STATEMENT

Screwdriver (Mafak) is a genre-blending film crossing lines between a haunting psychological thriller and social drama following Ziad, as he struggles to adjust to his chaotic new world after release from prison. Ziad is wrapped up in a Kafkaesque struggle of rehabilitation and feels on edge as he fails and unravels. Ziad's hallucinations increase until catatonic, and he turns into a master of self-imposed solitary confinement. His prison is his freedom. Ziad feels caged not confined, suffocated not isolated, abandoned and not alone. He reacts to his confinement with surges of panic and rage, losing control until the line between reality and fantasy is dangerously and permanently blurred.

Solitary prisoners' reliance on fantasy as a technique for survival captured my attention, and largely influenced the story of Screwdriver (Mafak). Although acute suffered symptoms subside post-solitary confinement, many prisoners suffer permanent damage crystalized as intolerance to social relations. Some prisoners become so reliant on prison to organize daily routine that they lose personal autonomy. Some seek return to prison. This stagnant ever-waiting hopelessness pervades Palestinian psyche. The result is an inability to define self without occupier, to organize and feel life without restriction.

Screwdriver (Mafak) is set in a place where films of that nature are scarce. The gruesome escalation of a character's hallucinations are neither shown nor discussed in the region. Ziad's audio-visual distortions become key for establishing emotional escalation, and play a major role in placing the viewer in his point of view. As for tone and texture, I opted for a more poetic treatment of violence; to avoid the horror of the violent act and rather render its aftermath. Using fiction that is grounded in reality, I found a subtle way of questioning complicated political issue without falling into sensationalism and voyeurism.

Screwdriver (Mafak) is set in the specifics of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, however, it can provide for a universal narrative of torture, confinement, and the battle with one's own image and reflection. This allows for the narrative to exist within the humanitarian rather than the political sphere. The current strength of the film stems from the multiplication of specific true life stories woven into a universal fiction – a fiction that highlights mental rather than physical traumas.

PRODUCTION NOTES

Bassam Jarbawi witnessed the first Intifada as a child. About a decade later between 2000-2002, as a teenager, he photographed the Al-Amari Refugee Camp in Ramallah during the Israeli incursion / second Intifada. The photographs he took during that time helped start a reference lookbook that he shared with the film's cinematographer David McFarland. Most of the preparation work done with David happened in the camp and was centered around getting a feel for the families in their private space.

With the help of Al-Amari camp residents the production team established its office right in the middle of the camp. Majority of the crew was local and the professional cast was ably supported by many first time actors some of whom were residents of the camp and many of them previously imprisoned. The production had cast an actress to play the female lead but she was unable to get a visa from the Israeli authorities to enter Palestine. With only a few days left to start principal photography, Yasmine Qaddumi one of the film's producers stepped in to play that character.

Lucie Legrand arrived from France to work on the graffiti murals. She designed and executed the beautiful murals in the refugee camp and at the Arab Evangelical Episcopal School in a matter of few days. They remain there to this day.

The film industry is in its nascent stages in the West Bank thus equipment and production supplies are scarce. David, as a result, had to use improvised lighting using reflected light / household fluorescent tubes, sodium bulbs along with the basic production equipment we had access to.

Bassam participated in the RAWI Screenwriters Lab, a Project of the Royal Film Commission – Jordan in consultation with Sundance Institute in 2011. Shrihari Sathe participated in the 2013 Sundance Institute Creative Production Fellowship and Lab.

Screwdriver (Mafak) which was previously known as Solitaire King received grants from the Sundance Institute Feature Film Program, a development grant from AFAC - The Arab Fund for Arts and Culture, a production grant from the Doha Film Institute and a post-production grant from SFFilm | Kenneth Rainin Foundation. The project participated in the Film Independent Fast Track, IFP No Borders and Mercato Internazionale Audiovisivo (previously known as New Cinema Network) markets.
