Shamima Begum (UK) and Hoda Muthana (US) made it into worldwide headlines when they left their countries as teenagers to join ISIS. Now they want to return but their countries don’t want them back.

SHORT SYNOPSIS

A unique access portrait of a group of Western women who devoted their young lives to ISIS, but who now want to be given the chance to start over back home in the West. Among them, probably the most famous British recruit Shamima Begum, who fled the country when she was 15, and Hoda Muthana from USA who allegedly incited her followers on Twitter to support the Islamic State. Universally reviled by the media, these women now tell their stories for the very first time.

LONG SYNOPSIS

THE RETURN: LIFE AFTER ISIS is a feature documentary that paints an intimate yet candid portrait of a group of Western women who devoted their young lives to ISIS, but who now want to be given the chance to rebuild their lives back at home. Generally reviled by a hostile media around the world, these women have granted unique access to director Alba Sotorra in an attempt to have their voices heard.

Shamima Begum (UK) and Hoda Muthana (US) made worldwide headlines when they left their countries as teenagers to join ISIS. Now, after the fall of ISIS, they are among hundreds of Western women and children being held in detention camps in northern Syria, unable to return home. None of their countries of origin want them back and in some cases, like Shamima’s, they have been stripped of the citizenship — a ruling her lawyers are challenging.

While the world sees the women as a threat, Sevinaz, a local Kurdish woman who is among the team overseeing the camps, is more forgiving. She runs a writing workshop in the camp, which gives Shamima and Hoda the chance to share their stories. Over time, the women grow in confidence and open up about their personal journeys: why they were attracted to ISIS in the first place, the traumas they faced while living under the ISIS regime, and their fears and hopes for the future.
DIRECTOR’S STATEMENT

In October 2017 I was at the frontlines of the war against ISIS in Raqqa, at that time the capital of the Islamic State. The city was besieged by the US-led coalition and Kurdish forces. The sound of the bombs was hair-raising, I could feel them in my chest. A group of civilians fleeing the air-shelling arrived at our position. Among them there was a young mother holding her child, they were covered in dust. When I got closer, I realized that her son was dead. I hugged her. That was the first day I cried for our enemies.

I had been following the war against ISIS from the Kurdish front since 2015 for my latest film COMMANDER ARIAN, which followed the story of a women’s commando who fought to drive ISIS from their territory. I saw only a small part of the horrors and crimes that ISIS committed, and I will never be able to erase them from my mind: dozens of bodies piled up in schools, hundreds of families screaming in pain, thousands and thousands of graves of young male and female Kurdish fighters in brand-new graveyards. For me, ISIS was the personification of evil, something to hate and destroy. But that day in Raqqa I saw the human face of ISIS for the first time. Then I felt the need to make this movie.

I started filming "The Return: Life after ISIS" in March 2019, when ISIS was militarily defeated by the US-led coalition and Kurdish forces in their last stronghold in Baghouz. The aftermath was devastating: thousands of women and children of more than 50 nationalities with nowhere to go. Internationally, a heated debate aroused over whether or not former ISIS militants should be allowed to return home. The overwhelmed Kurdish authorities improvised detention camps, waiting for international governments to decide the fate of their outcasted citizens. Thanks to the ties I forged with the Kurdish administration after years of filming at their frontlines, I was granted unprecedented access to one of the detention camps.

For two years I have been following the stories of the women who have made headlines around the world: the English Shamima Begum, who left London for Syria at the age of 15, the American Hoda Muthana, mentioned by Trump in a tweet about why she should not be allowed to return to the United States, the Canadian Kimberly Polman, the Dutch Nawal and Hafida and the German Ouidad. The stories of their struggle to return and the public debate they have sparked are intertwined with their emotional accounts of the horrors they lived under ISIS. Their situation has been — and will be for the foreseeable future — very broadly debated on media all around the world, with special focus on the UK and the US.

The filming process was emotionally challenging: we were an all-female crew and half of us were young Kurdish women who had lost family and friends in the fight against ISIS. I myself have lost friends in the war. The first days were tense, but as time passed and we began to feel each other, the walls of fear and pain fell to make room for an honest dialogue that created a very special bond between the film crew and our protagonists. It was a cathartic process for all of us that challenged the views and preconceptions we had of each other. We were all women who shared hurts and we realized that blaming each other was foolish and would only lead to more pain. The only way out was to try to leave the hatred behind and start over, with compassion, forgiveness and understanding.
THE RETURN: LIFE AFTER ISIS takes a very intimate approach to this public debate, thanks to our unique access to women and their stories, challenging the viewer to look at this reality from a different perspective. We believe that the film has great potential to become an agent of change, to reframe conversations around this controversial topic and to foster dialogue, understanding and peace.

SHAMIMA BEGUM, 21, UK
Shamima Begum made worldwide headlines when, at the age of 15, she left the UK with two teenage friends to join ISIS. Four years later, having lost three children to disease and malnutrition, she surrendered to the coalition forces and is now held in a detention camp in Northern Syria. In 2019, the UK revoked her British nationality — on the grounds she could obtain Bengali nationality because of her parents’ ascendance. Her family has started a legal battle against the Home Office to defend her right to enter the UK to appeal the deprivation of her nationality. They are currently expecting the Supreme Court’s judgement.

HODA MUTHANA, 24, USA
Hoda Muthana was 20 when she left the US to join ISIS in November 2014. Her name reached worldwide headlines when her Twitter feed filled up with tweets advocating for terror attacks against civilians and encouraging people to travel to Syria to support ISIS. In January 2019, she surrendered to coalition forces with her son Adam, born inside the so-called Caliphate. They have since been denied entry to the US; the government claims she is not, and never has been, a US citizen. They are now held in a detention camp in Northern Syria trying to appeal these claims. In January 2021, the Court of Appeals ruled against her, upholding the district court’s decision that denies her citizenship claim.
